ABSTRACT

Electrical connections are made between a pair of elements disposed on opposite side of the hole extending through a dielectric layer by evaporating a conductive material such as a metal having high vapor pressure within the hole while maintaining the hole in a substantially sealed condition. The process may be performed simultaneously to form numerous connections within a microelectronic unit as, for example, within a multilayer circuit panel.

456461_1.DOC